

CSE - 3 CSE Page Formatting

Organization

 Organize your paper according to the following components; use headings to label sections after the authors' names. Brief descriptions of each section are included.

Title – uses only the number of words necessary to clearly indicate the paper's overall point. This appears on your title page.

Author(s) – those responsible for the experiment and paper. This appears on your title page. It may also contain class and date information.

Abstract – short synopsis of the paper's content

Introduction – concise; provides background and objectives

Materials and Methods – articulates how the experiment was conducted (in past tense)

Results – texts and visuals to share the findings of the project

Discussion – interpretation of the results, often including suggestions and clarifications

Acknowledgements – formal recognition of those who assisted the authors

References – a list of sources used to inform the experiment and paper (see CSE citation handouts)

Headings

 When a large section of the paper could benefit from two or more labeled subsections, follow this model. Headings may also be placed (1st level) in the center above a section, (2nd) flush left above a section, and (3rd) flush left and immediately followed by text.

First level:           Results
                                  The first level is followed on a new line by indented text.

Second level:       Preliminary Findings

Third level:         WEEK 1

Fourth level:        Monday This level is followed immediately by text.

Title Page

👉 If a title page is required by the type of document you are producing, it should generally include the following information centered on the first page:

Title - informative but concise

Byline - Author(s) name(s)

Date

Abstract

Allison Wanda Lend states in her excellent 2015 essay Where My Name Can Take Me that children's names are far more than simple labels used for convenience between individuals. While this study is often regarded as farfetched, there are several benefits of useful information through the
