Adult Learners' Experiences and Perceptions of Barriers in Online Community College Courses

The number of adult learners in community colleges has been growing over the past few decades. To meet the increased enrollment of adult learners who often have competing priorities such as full-time work and care-giving responsibilities, community colleges have increased the number of online courses. Online courses provide adult learners with convenience and flexibility to complete their education. However, despite the increased access to online courses, attrition rates for this student demographic remain high.

Therefore, the purpose of this phenomenological qualitative study was to examine adult learners' experiences and perceptions of barriers in online community college courses.
