This study evaluates the ability of positive psychological factors (specifically, gratitude, self-esteem, and posttraumatic growth) to mitigate risk (after childhood maltreatment, low social support, and low socioeconomic status) for delinquent behavior in young adults. Through a resilience-informed framework, positive psychology may act as a tool to improve the lives of people who have experienced adversity.