Community Type in Context: Expectations of Guardianship and Victimization Experiences on a College Campus

Guardianship originates from the opportunities’ perspective but can be traced throughout the communities and crime literature. Guardianship can be viewed as informal social controls at the community level. This study examines the impact of community type on expectations for guardianship. It also investigates the potential impact of these guardianship expectations on victimization on a college campus. This study uses original survey data collection. Ultimately, community type does have some impact on expected guardianship. However, expectations of guardianship do not impact vulnerability to victimization on campus.
