This study examined the roles of moral foundations, forgiveness, and disgust in the willingness to reintegrate sex offenders into a religious community. Based on a review of the literature on attitudes toward sex offenders and theories of willingness to reintegrate, an online survey was distributed to students at Sam Houston State University. The main findings of the study are that moral foundations were significant predictors of being willing to reintegrate. Disgust sensitivity was associated with a decreased likelihood of being willing to reintegrate, but only under certain conditions. Race unexpectedly played a significant role.