Stemming from critical narrative victimology, the study begins by situating the victimization experiences of Black women in ‘real-time’ sexual assault exam reports. This project integrates a Black feminist perspective with narrative victimology to propose critical narrative victimology, which extends these works by contextualizing Black women’s victimization and help-seeking experiences. This dissertation work also proposes a typology of Black women’s sexual victimization and help-seeking needs. Key findings, implications, and policy recommendations are discussed.
