The current study examines hindsight bias (through outcome information) and group membership’s effects on perceptions of bystanders in a sexual assault situation. Participants read a vignette describing a potential sexual assault scenario where a bystander fails to intervene. Importantly, some participants received outcome information, which either explicitly confirms an assault did or did not occur, while others did not receive any outcome information.