This dissertation examines the associations between psychopathic traits, cyber aggression, and victimization among college students. Evidence suggests individual personality traits may be related to the likelihood of engaging in both antisocial behavior and experiencing victimization, implicating the importance of bystander intervention programs and cognitive behavioral training.