Suicide has been identified as the eighth leading cause of death for Black/African Americans. Black/African Americans who experience race-related stress are more susceptible to suicidality; however, very few studies have examined this association. Further, there is a dearth of literature on the potential factors that influence this association. Thus, the current study aimed to investigate the association between race-related stress, suicide and its correlates as well as the moderating effect of personality and gender.